By taking these courses, you are demonstrating skills that employers value, as well as ones that prepare you for higher education.

Most colleges require you to take a broad range of courses in your first two years so that you can choose, electively, and explore new interests. You will probably be required to take courses in the liberal arts: science, literature, history, foreign languages, social sciences, mathematics, and natural sciences. Through the study of these you develop general knowledge if you know what you want to major in, you can begin to take more specialized courses in that subject. If you don't know, you can use these two years to make up your mind.
