The is a list of different possible cancers he might have and that is the first question to answer. I presume it is lung (adenocarcinoma) but it could (less likely) even be a highly-treatable testicular/germ cell tumor. It could be a melanoma. The difference is vital in terms of treatment and prognosis. Also some lung cancer in "non-smokers" can be more treatable with remissions lasting years. As of today the most upsetting fact is that it is so extensive; lung, brain, liver and bone. How long? Without having details weeks to months. But with luck maybe much better; depending on the specific type and other specific biological characteristics of HIS cancer. Not many people win the lottery but some do. Right now I very sad and struggling to be hopeful

Right now nothing. I asked him to send me actual copies of all his scans and labs. I ordered some medicines for him. The next step is to get an adequate "tissue" biopsy so we know exactly what we are dealing with. I will talk to his MDs down there and help coordinate the workup in a timely fashion and then we can strategize a therapeutic plan. I probably will fly down there once we have some more information. I have both his and Linda's contact information and I'll check in daily. They know they can call me 24/7. "IF" he is a candidate for some unique / "investigational" treatment we can then look to you to help if he does not have easy access to it. Its very serious and very upsetting for all involved. Stay in touch Michael
